FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

The Little Acrobat.

Douglas Tilden, the mute California sculptor, now a resident of Paris, has given to his native land several proofs of his genius. "The Ball Thrower" in Golden Gate park and "The Tired Boxer" in the new Olympic club building are fine specimens of the sculptor's art, and at the World's fair his group of Indians fighting bears has attracted much attention.

Quite recently he sent to this city a mark of his friendship for a gentleman who has done much to help and encourage him.

age him. This work, which also bears strong evidence of the sculptor's unquestioned skill, is now on view at the Hopkins Institute of Art. It is an odd and pretty conceit, an original idea in marble and bronze.

The sculpture is called "The Little Acrobat" and consists of the muscular arm of a man, on the outspread hand of which sits a baby. The arm, with the sleeve rolled back to the shoulder, is a fine study in anatomy, showing muscle, bones, veins, in splendid style. The timid baby will, however, attract most attention. The half fearful expression of the little acrobat, the one foot steadied against the brawny arm, the other drawn up, the half outstretched hands, all portray the evident insecurity to the baby's mind of the seat it occupies. The modeling of the figure is very pleasing, and the whole conception is fascinating.—San Francisco Chronicle.

A Remarkable Dog.

A remarkable dog is the property of Professor Kyle of Flushing, N. Y. The other day Professor Kyle sent one of his pupils to the Flushing bank with a deposit of $60 in $10 bills. When the boy reached the bank, he held only the empty bankbook. He had lost the money on the way. He went back to the institute, a distance of half a mile, and reported the loss to Professor Kyle. The dog was present and seemed to understand what was the matter, for his friends say he sprang out of doors with a joyous bark and galloped through the various streets back and forth and was soon lost to view. In 15 minutes he returned with the six $10 bills in his mouth, and though one of them was mutilated somewhat by the dog in his excitement it was subsequently patched up and deposited in the bank to the professor's credit with the other five.—Harper's Young People.

A Young King in School.

The young king of Servia, Alexander I, who, in consequence of his father's abdication wears a crown at the age of 16, is perhaps not a perfect monarch, but he is a scholar of no mean merit. Last year he obtained the mark of "excellent" at all his examinations and was constantly at the head of his class, of which he was the only pupil. This year shows no falling off in the zeal of the young sovereign, and we hear with considerable satisfaction that last Wednesday he passed his examination in military practice with "the highest distinction." Alexander I learned in two months how to drill the lead soldiers which the emperor of Austria sent him last New Year's day.—Salt Public.

Helping Crippled Children.

On Clinton street, Brooklyn, there is a modern dwelling house which has been transformed into a hospital—St. Giles' Home and Hospital for Crippled Children. It is one of the most worthy charities of the city, and a number of earnest women, assisted by a physician and a clergyman of Brooklyn, are working hard to make it a permanent institution, for it is in its infancy as yet. Helpless and crippled little ones are taken in and cared for irrespective of creed or color and are helped back to whatever strength and health are to be their portion. One of the recent efforts to aid St. Giles' home was an entertainment given at the Criterion theater by a number of pupils from a public school. A little girl who distinguished herself on that occasion for her grace and prettiness was Miss Ada Swanson, who assumed the role of the Angel of Light. Robed in fleecy white, with a glittering diadem upon her curls, she looked as like an angel as real mortal can imagine. Her singing and dancing were also features of the performance.

A Cat That Is Bound to Live.

When he wandered into our boarding house on Lackawanna avenue, he was a nice little tomcat with eyes as innocent as a child's. He used to stand on his hind legs and cry for milk, and as long as he conducted himself he was treated well. He, however, became thievish and insufferably lazy. He used to purloin the choicest beefsteaks, take them down to the cellar and devour them. He used also to get in the way of the girls, who were generally in a hurry at mealtime, and the help became thoroughly sick and tired of him.

One day the dishwasher flung him out of the fourth story back window. He didn't seem to mind it in the least though. He alighted on his paws, and looking up at the girl he winked his right eye, as much as to say, "No, you don't," and then walked leisurely round to the front of the house and came into the kitchen again in all his philosophic calm and just as though nothing unusual had happened.

The next day Thomas was tied up in a bag and deposited somewhere in the wilds near Taylor, but, lo and behold, he returned about three weeks afterward at 3 o'clock in the morning to his old home and woke up the whole block with his piteous appeals for food and shelter. He was given both. It was thought that he might possibly reform, but he didn't. He became still more thievish and lazy.

Then it was determined that he should die by poison. A nice juicy piece of beef was sprinkled with strychnine, and he was locked up in a closet with it for four days. Everybody thought he would be dead sure when the closet was opened, but he wasn't. He just simply purred and clawed the floor for joy when he was released. He had sense enough not to touch the poisoned meat at all. Finally he was locked down in the bottom cellar, the third from the surface of the street, and when seen a few days ago he was as fat and sleek and comfortable as any cat in the city of Scranton. He is living on rats, and the diet seems to agree with him.—Scranton Truth.

Diagnosing an Illness.

It would seem to be simple enough to attribute the fever which ordinarily follows the fracture of a leg to the irritation which is set up in the limb by the accident, yet, in point of fact, that fever is not seldom the result of the sympathetic disturbance of nerve centers, as, for example, those of the stomach, and in treating it it becomes necessary to take these into consideration. I have selected this illustration because the results of such an accident as the fracture of a leg would appear to be of all things the simplest to diagnose. When we approach such ailments as nervous diseases we find ourselves literally wandering in a maze through which there is no path. It is commonly enough known, even by those who have not studied medicine, that while each disease shows certain symptoms common to each recurrence of it, each case must be treated separately and allowance made for many things peculiar to the patient.

Among these are his or her occupation in life, habits, food, constitution or stamina, previous ailments and, above all, heredity or those tendencies which have come from his parents. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes in "Elsie Venner" makes the old family physician refer to the knowledge he has gained, during many years of practice, of the hereditary constitution of his patients, and the doctor adds that no school of science, no medical education can give this knowledge to his young competitors. All this is true, wonderfully true, and it is the lack of just this knowledge of the past which makes some cases of disease so terribly puzzling and which makes each case individual in itself.—Cyrus Edson, M. D., in North American Review.

The Steaming Process.

Two Detroit young ladies met at a dry goods counter and for a time blocked the channels of trade by an exchange of experiences.

"You are looking so transparent," said one. "Tell me, dearest, what have you been doing to yourself?"

"Steaming," answered dearest, with a self satisfied sigh. "It's tiresome and hot, but the end justifies the means. I don't use powder any more—the hot water has a better effect. I'm almost parboiled now. And you?"

"Do I look improved, dearest?"

"Oh, yes, yes. You are so spirituelle. Do you sit up all night?"

"No. I don't eat meat, and I pose. I just stare at nothing for hours and hours. That gives me the true Hindoostic expression of transcendentalism. Oh, dearest, it is so improving to look at nothing and think of nothing for a long time. It is like the Sphinx."

"Excuse me," answered dearest slangily. "If I went into such 'improvement,' the family would shut me up and feed me on bread and water. I steam my features on the sly as it is."

Then these souls in Muffi fell to buying dry goods like ordinary women who do not pose, neither do they steam.—Detroit Free Press.

He Remembered the Pins.

Fritz had been ordered by his master to take four horses and a jury—which is a sort of car much used by coal miners and others who have need of vehicles for the conveyance of very heavy articles—and fetch a steam boiler from a neighboring town. Just as he was about to start his master's wife called him in and said: "Fritz, here's threepence. I want you to bring me a packet of pins, and please don't forget it."

"No, ma'am," said Fritz, and off he started.

Some hours later Fritz came back, drove up to the house, unharnessed the horses, stepped into the house and delivered the small parcel of pins to the lady.

"I say, Fritz," said his master, who was standing at the window, "what have you done with the boiler?"

"Boiler, sir?" answered Fritz. "Donnerwetter, sir. I hope you won't be vexed, but I clean forgot it."—Harper's Young People.
